Dhomas Jinny

CONSEQUENCES

A LIE.

FOUNDED ON RECENT FACTS.

Y

MARIANNE NEVILLE.

With Copper Plates.

LONDON:

WILLIAM DARTON AND SON,

HOLBORN HILL.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

W-11-2

CHILDREN'S BOOK
COLLECTION LIBRARY OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

 100

Thomas Simones Edstone

THE

CONSEQUENCES

OF

A LIE.

FOUNDED ON RECENT FACTS.

BY MARIANNE NEVILLE.

With Copper Plates.

LONDON:

WILLIAM DARTON AND SON, HOLBORN HILL.

adond the

.4 (1. 1. 1.

ARDEL AREA

Aldr. Skilling

country ... ignite origin

1.00 0.04:

THE LEGISLAND THE PROPERTY HELD

CONSEQUENCES 201

ten fixed in a A Transfer ing the store the many re-

James Lind say was six years old, and a very fine boy, he had but one fault, but that one was enough to destroy all his other good deeds. He never told truth, and no person could depend on any thing that he said; he took more trou ble to in vent a lie, than to learn his lesson; if he told one lie in the morning, he had to tell twen ty to hide it, be fore night, he often for got what he said, and so was found out, in not telling the story the same way. -From this practise of lying, when he did by chance tell the truth, no one be lieved him, and then he began to cry.

One day he was throwing peb bles in to the drawing room, when the win dow was o pen; one of them struck the pier glass, and broke it all in pie ces. James was ve ry much fright en ed, but he took up the stone, and thought that he could es cape by say ing, it was the house maid who struck the han dle of the brush against it. Mrs. Lind say soon came in, and was very an gry when she saw the glass broke, for it had cost a hund red gui neas: she rung the bell to in quire of the house maid, who had broken it. James said he saw her break it with the brush; and as he had been se verely punish ed by his fa ther, the day before, for telling a lie about some ink that had been spilled, Mrs. Lind say did not think he would so soon transgress, but thought for this time he told the truth. But, a las! who can de pend on a li ar? The housemaid was dis charg ed, and lost her place, and as she could not get a si tu a tion, was o blig ed to spend all her wages, and to live in a wretched cabin, as she could not af ford to pay for a decent lodging. Three months had now pass ed a way, and James was standing at the door, waiting for his pony; he had a large piece of plum cake in his hand, which he was de vour ing with ea gerness, when he per ceived a young wo man approach the gate, she had hard ly any clothes on, and seem ed very ill; she lean ed a gainst the gate; which she did not see was a little open, and fell back; she cut her head dread fully. James, who was real ly good na tur ed, flew to as sist her, and finding she did not stir, ran in to the house to call for help, for that a poor wo man had fall en down dead on the steps. The but ler, whom he met, laugh ed. "O, Mr. James," said he, "this is on ly one of your stories, I do not suppose there is any body there, I shall not stir for your story." "Nor I neither," said the cook, "Mas ter James ne ver tells the truth, and we go of no fool's er rand for him. He lost Mary Jones her place, and I dare say he ne ver made it up to her since; I wonder what is become of her." "Oh! stop, in mer cy," cried James, "and see this poor creature that is dying at the door. Indeed it is all true now, what I say, and I will ne ver tell a lie a gain." "But you have said that so of ten, Mas ter James, we do not know how to believe you." "On ly just see," said James, "and then you will be lieve me; if it is not so, I will ne ver ask you to trust me a gain."

Here a deep groan was heard. "Did you hear that?" said the cook.

"It is this poor crea ture whose moans you hear," said James; "will you come now."

applifulting howards and engo read

"May be it is true after all," said the cook, "I will just go to the window, and see a bout her." She went, and saw what ap pear ed the body of a young wo man, from whom deep groans pro ceed ed, ly ing a cross the steps. The cook im me di ate ly called Mrs. Dan ley, the lady's maid, to get some drops to revive the poor suffer er, whom they raised from the ground. Her face was covered with blood which had flowed from her tem ple when she fell. James brought a glass of water, and with his hand ker chief washed the blood from her face. But what were his feel ings, on doing so, when he found the poor wo man was no other than Mary Jones, the house maid, whom he had deprived of bread, by telling a lie about the look ing glass!

James burst into tears, and as Mary recovered, asked her how she came to be in this state. She said she had not eaten any thing for three days, and feeling faint, leaned against the gate, which she did not know was open; she was going to ask Mrs. Lind say leave to weed in the gar den, that she might have some thing to earn her bread ho nestly, and to as sure her she ne ver broke the pier glass. "But even if I did," con ti nued she, "I have been in want and misery ever since, and would tell no lie a bout it, to screen my own mis con duct." "I will clear you to mam ma this moment," said James, and ran to the drawing room, where there were se ve ral visi ters, but his heart was too full to think of who were pre sent. James ad vanc ed with clasp ed hands, and confess ed be fore them all, that it was he who had broken the glass, and had been the cause of Mary Jones's being parted with; and told her ac cident and mis for tunes, which were all brought on in con sequence of his telling a lie.

Mrs. Lind say went down to the kit chen to see her, and found all as James had re present ed. Mary Jones was in a deep de cline, from the effects of poverty and starvation, but she still hoped, that if she got a little better, she might, per haps, by good living and kind treatment, revive. At present she was unable to work, and had not clothes suffi cient to make her de cent in any gentle man's house. Mrs. Lind say gave her half a crown, and said she would con si der what could be done for her, and de sir ed the cook to give her her din ner, and to take care of her that day.

[&]quot;O, mam ma," said James, cry ing, "take all my pock et mo ney, and lay it out in clothes for Mary Jones. How can I repair the injury I have done her? If she should die, I am the wretch who is the cause of it." Here the sobs check ed his ut ter ance; "I will ne ver tell a lie a gain, in deed I will not, it is I who have killed her. Will you not if she recovers, take her again as house maid? and I shall feel hap py once more."

"My dear James," said Mrs. Lind say, "it is not with us to de termine a bout her; she will, probably, in a few weeks be relieved from all suffering; I deeply de plore your being the cause of her present si tu a tion, and hope you will prove the since rity of your repentance, by the amend ment of your life, and will give her all the comfort which is in your power. We will get a lodging for her at the gate, and you can visit her e ve ry day, and take her a ny thing that may be of use to her, and by seeing her daily, it will be a les son to you all your life. I will see that your money is laid out for her, to the best ad van tage, and am ve ry glad you are so ready to give it for her, though mo ney can be of little use to one on the brink of the grave." "Oh, mam ma, I will nurse her, she must not die—I will pray with all my heart for her re co very." "Do my child," said Mrs. Lind say, "and pray also, for your own for give ness, in having brought her to this state by a false hood."

After this, James was very thought ful, and was of ten seen stealing out on tip toe to vi sit Mary Jones in the gatehouse, where he u sed to bring her fruit and jelly, which the house keep er made for her: he ask ed her to for give him, before she died; which she did, from all her heart, but re quest ed he would read the Bible to her every day, and remain in the room when Mr. Bar low, the cler gy man, came to vi sit her, as his pious con ver sa tion and pray er, might do him more good, in enabling him to leave off lying, than any thing she could say. For, though his feel ings were work ed on for the moment, when she was gone, her remem brance would die with her, and he might relapse into his for mer habits. Mrs. Lind say had much con ver sation with Mr. Barlow about her son, and he ap proved much of his being present when he vi si ted Mary, and was pleased to find the impression on his mind seem ed of a lasting nature. This he took care to im prove; and after a little time, Mrs. Lindsay re solv ed to place him under his care for a year, un til his sad propen si ty for lying was eradicated, not from fear, but from principle.

Mary Jones now drew near her last home, and ex press ed a wish to see James before she died. He came di rect ly. She stretched out her hand to him, in to ken of for give ness. Her eyes were sunk, and her breathing so oppressed, that she could hardly speak. At last she made a great effort, and sat up, then fixing her dark eyes on him, said in broken ac cents:

"I thank you for all the com forts you have giv en me in this my last ill ness, and for our Re deem er's sake, I forgive you all that you have done a gainst me. Let my deathbed be a warning to you, to speak the truth from your heart; it was my mother's max im, "nev er to let a lie pass my lips, for it would be a burning coal to my heart here after;" it is one of the ways in which Mr. Barlow told you the sixth com mand ment was broken, for de stroying the character by false hood is a death to the soul, and of ten followed by the destruction of the body. I shall die happy, in the sure hope of a christian, who has no reliance on her own merits, but a firm trust in the a tone ment of the Son of God, who came in to the world to save sin ners. do not wish to praise my self at this aw ful mo ment, but for your ad van tage, tell you, it is one source of my pre sent calm ness, to feel, that no distress, or fear of an ger, ever tempt ed me to tell a lie; this I wish to im press on your mind, and hope, when you are tempted by false shame, or the wiles of Sa tan, to for sake the truth, that you will give a thought to poor Mary Jones, and look at this lock of hair, which, with her blessing, is all she has to give."

Mary fell back ex haust ed, and James drown ed in tears, press ed the lock of hair to his lips, and said, he would get it set in a broch et, and wear it next his heart, and it should have on one side, "Mary Jones," and on the other, "Re member Truth." She look ed up, and a faint smile pass ed over her pale features, and pressing his hand in to ken of ap pro bation, she gave a deep sigh, and her spirit fled for ever.

James was removed from the scene of death, which made a deep impression on his mind. When the bell tolled for her funeral, he thought every stroke went to his heart. He wept in ces sant ly, but still deter min ed to at tend her remains to the grave, but it was how ever too much for his feel ings, and he was car ried a way.

Some time after he had been with Mr. Bar low, he express ed a wish to vi sit Ma ry Jones's grave, and Mr. Bar low ac companied him. To his surprise he saw a neat mo nument put up, with this simple but pa the tic in scrip tion:—

e 3

"Here lies Mary Jones, a ged 26 years, who died August 7, 1826. She never told a lie."

James's eyes suffus ed with tears, as he read the last sentence. "When ever you transgress," said Mr. Bar low, "we will walk here, I need make no further comment at present, for since you have been with me, you have kept your word."

James did not speak, his heart was too full to an swer,

the result of the desired and Mr. Bar low changed the subject. He led him to a walk which he had ne ver seen before, that ended in a roman tic grot to, near a stream that flow ed o ver a variety of pebbles. James took up some of them, and put two or three into his pocket. After which they gathered some curious plants, which Mr. Bar low told him the use of, and they re turned home. Shortly after Mr. Bar low re ceiv ed a note from Mrs.Lindsay, expressive of her joy at finding her son so much re form ed, and that he had not been guilty of false hood an entire month.—Part of this let ter Mr. Barlow read a loud, and folding it up, put it into a drawer of his cabinet, and told James, he would leave it un lock ed; and to be sure not to touch it during his ab sence for an hour, for that he would know if he was tempt ed to do a dis hon our a ble action.

James pro mis ed he would not go near the draw er, and in tend ed to keep his word, and took up a book to a muse him self for half an hour. At last he thought, how he should like to read just the part Mr. Bar low read of his mam ma's let ter, and would not for the world read a line further. "Be sides," said he to him self, "how can Mr. Bar low know it? I can shut the draw er ag ain."

But if he asks me, what shall I say?" thought James: here he almost form ed a ready lie. At last he put his hand in his bo som that he might not touch the drawer, and with out thinking of what he was a bout, he un but ton ed his waist coat, and the locket fell out, and he read in gold let ters, "Re mem ber Truth, and Mary Jones."-His heart smote him, and he walked a round the room, saying aloud to him self all the time, "I will fly temp ta tion, if I cannot stand it," and made a dart to the door. Mr. Bar low met him in the pas sage. "My dear James," said he, "I rejoice that you have con quered your self; I was in the library, and heard all you said, and I am more pleased at your steady resistance of temp tation, than if you had learned a hun dred less ons out of a book." But if I had opened the drawer how would you have known it?" asked James: "you heard me talking to myself, but you could not see me o pen the drawer." Mr. Barlow smiled .- "Open it now, and tell me if you could, by any lie, de ceive me." and it no B to The William Co Ville

James opened the draw er, and gave a cry of as tonishment, at hearing a most delightful strain of music proceed from the drawer.—He look ed, and could see no thing but his mam ma's let ter: still the mu sic continued for above fit teen mi nutes.

Mr. Bar low en joy ed his sur prise. "Con fess now, James, if this draw er would not have con vict ed you at once, if you had be tray ed my con fi dence. I see now you may be trust ed, and are an ho nor a ble boy. And I will show you that I am no magician. It is a mu si cal draw er, like one of the French snuff box es, and the effort of pulling it out sets it going: here is the spring. This ca binet was made in France, for the Prin cess Pau line, and the drawer was intended for a money drawer; so that if a ny thieves should break it open, the music would suddenly fright en and be tray them, which re port says, it did.

"Here is now your mother's let ter, and may your future life render that affectionate and a mi a ble wo man happy, by your strict ad her ence to Truth."

Four years have since passed a way, with out James having told a single lie. His charac ter is now so re spect ed for strict adherence to Truth, that to prove a thing, his school fellows have only to say "James Lindsay said it"or, "it must be so, for it was affirmed by James." He daily gains friends, and when he grows up, will be an or nament to so cie ty. And we must not o mit to men tion that neither ridicule nor false pride has made him re lin quish his an nu al vi sits to the tomb of Mary Jones, from whose death the a mend ment of his life may be dated.

The reader who may peruse this tale, if he has hi ther to been in the habit of keeping the truth sa cred, will, it is to be hoped, be confirmed in his resolution, to avoid falsehood. It is impossible for a li ar al ways to e scape de tection, and when once dis cover ed, he loses the respect of e ve ry one. If, there fore, these pages meet the eye of young per sons who have at any time been guilty of falsehood, let them reflect seriously up on a crime which will draw down up on them the con tempt of their fel low crea tures, and the anger of their Ma ker. James repented sin cere ly; but how much hap pi er would it have been for him had he never number ed the sufferings and death of poor Mary Jones, as THE CON SEQUENCES OF A LIE.

MASTERS, PRINTER, ALDERSGATE STREET.

